Patriotic Report

10/16/15

On October 4, 1777 the Continental Army took on the British Army in Germantown, Pennsylvania, where the Continental Army/Militia under George Washington and Nathaniel Greene along with a Canadian Regiment attempted to take the small village of Germantown Pennsylvania out of British and Hessian control. The Continental Army had 11,000 men altogether while the British and Hessians had 9,000.

When it was all said and done Washington retreated, even though he lost approx 150 men and he didn't win the battle that day, it was a turning point in the war for the Continental Army who eventually won the American Revolution in 1781. The significance was that this was a turning point in the war for Independence against the crown, the British and Hessians happened to be better trained for the combat than the Militias who made up the Continental Army.
